

Laurentian University, a bilingual and tricultural institution, has been Ontario's fourth fastest growing university since 2000, with enrolment increasing from 6,000 to 9,000 students. Laurentian's admissions were up by 11% this year alone. French-language undergraduate admissions are up by 26% and international student admissions by 40%.

With its main campus in Sudbury, Ontario, the University attracts more students every year from northeastern Ontario than the next five universities combined, and its success is increasingly being noticed outside the region. Today, half of Laurentian students come from the rest of the province, the country and the world.

Laurentian University recently ranked sixth among Canada's universities for growth in research funding according to Research Infosource. It is northern Ontario's research and science hub with notable expertise in areas such as the environment, mining and health. It offers seven PhD programs and over 20 master's degrees.

Under the leadership of its new President, Laurentian will focus its energy in the coming years on four key goals: to enhance its national recognition, to continue making it a university of choice, to foster strong student engagement and to be responsive to the communities it serves.
